TOTAL CORRECT: _____

Has Music Become Less Special?

1. Humans have always made music. A 50,000-year-old bone flute suggests that even Neanderthals created sound and rhythm, proving that music is not just entertainment but part of human nature. What has changed dramatically is not music itself, but how we experience it.

2. When the radio became popular, people used to listen to the same songs at the same time. A new hit could unite whole cities. Music used to create shared cultural moments, and different generations used to know the same songs. This created what some call a “monoculture,” a shared musical language. Today, that experience is weaker. Streaming platforms allow everyone to choose their own artists and playlists, meaning two friends can sit next to each other while listening to completely different music.

3. MTV changed music again. Musicians were judged not only by their sound but also by their appearance, fashion, and performance style. Music videos turned artists into global visual icons, creating new creative possibilities but also new pressure. Looking good became almost as important as sounding good, and some critics argue that music became more about marketing than artistry. In today’s social media era, artists are expected to be musicians, influencers, and brands at the same time.

4. Portable music created another shift. Devices like the Walkman and later MP3 players allowed people to carry music everywhere and create their own personal soundtrack. People would gather around one radio, but later they started listening alone with headphones. It felt freeing, but also isolating.

5. Streaming platforms created another transformation. Almost every song is now instantly available, and independent artists can reach global audiences. However, people didn’t use to have unlimited access to music, and today listeners often skip songs more quickly. Artists earn very little per stream, often around $0.003 to $0.005 per play, meaning a musician may need millions of streams to earn a meaningful income. Many now rely more on touring and merchandise than music sales.

6. Finally, there is another debate. When music was harder to access, people used to listen to the same albums repeatedly, allowing songs to grow and gain meaning over time. Today, with millions of options available, attention is shorter, and music can sometimes become background noise rather than a deep experience. Streaming has expanded access and diversity, but some argue it has also made music feel more disposable.

'used to' & 'would'

We use used to for past habits and situations that are no longer true.

✓ Positive: Subject + used to + verb

→ People used to listen to the radio.

✗ Negative: Subject + didn't use to + verb

→ People didn't use to skip songs.

? Question: Did + subject + use to + verb?

→ Did people use to buy albums?

We use would for repeated past actions (NOT states).

✓ Families would gather around the radio.

✓ People would listen to full albums.

⚠ Key Difference: used to → actions + states vs. would → actions only

5. Complete the sentences using used to, didn't use to, or would.

1. In the past, people wait for their favourite song on the radio.
2. Years ago, families listen to music together in the same room.
3. In the past, people have access to millions of songs.
4. In the past, listeners skip songs so quickly.
5. Years ago, artists worry so much about social media.
6. In the past, people buy full albums instead of single songs.
