Mr. Brown works in a small office in Cornwall. He is an accountant. He likes numbers because they are always the same. People are not always the same. Mr. Brown likes numbers more than people.

Every day, Mr. Brown starts work at exactly 9:00. Not 8:59. Not 9:01. Always 9:00.

At 9:01, he sits down at his desk. At 9:02, he turns on his computer. At 9:03, he checks his emails.

He always checks his emails in the same order. First the important emails, then the less important emails. Sometimes he gets URGENT!! emails from his boss. Mr. Brown does not like urgent emails.

At 10:30, he takes a short break. He goes to the canteen and drinks a coffee. He always sits in the same chair. If someone is sitting in Mr. Brown's chair, Mr. Brown stops. He looks at the chair. Then he looks at the person. Then he looks at the chair again. He does not say anything. He just stands and waits.

At 1:00, he has lunch. He eats the same lunch every day: a sandwich, a green apple, and a cup of tea. First the sandwich. Then the green apple. Then the tea. He always drinks the tea very slowly.

In the afternoon, he works very quietly. He checks numbers, writes reports, and checks the numbers again.

At 4:55, he looks at the clock. At 4:57, he looks at the clock again. At 4:59, he is ready.

At 5:00, Mr. Brown stands up, puts on his jacket, and leaves the office.

Mr. Brown likes his job because everything is the same. For Mr. Brown, a perfect day is a day with no surprises. Today is a perfect day.
